James Thomas Workman experienced all the hardships of the trek across the plains with the "Mormon" pioneers. He was old enough to realize the sorrow of his mother's untimely death and the struggles made by his pioneer father to keep his family together and raise them in the untried west. Growing to manhood in Salt Lake City, he married and settled in Farmington, a few miles north of Salt Lake, where he and his family lived for 21 years. In 1885 he and his family moved to the Snake River Valley where they again pioneered in the building of the town of Parker, Idaho. He was a man well-loved by his neighbors and family for his kindness and generosity and his regard for the welfare of others.
